

Sommaire

Introduction	5
“Entangled in metaphors”: visions and notions in Middlemarch	13
Painting	13
Seeing	19
Thinking	24
Writing	29
The Narrative Voice of Middlemarch	37
The Belated Historian and her Method	39
A Sympathetic Narrator	45
Narrative Choices	52
Polyphony	58
“I protest against any absolute conclusion” (77)	62
Is Middlemarch a dark novel?	67
Going back in time to a darker period	69
Dealing with a dark human experience	74
George Eliot’s original treatment of such dark subjects	84
Conclusion	91
Humour, Irony and eirōneia in Middlemarch	95
Unexpected humour	95
Describing and debunking	99
Double-edged misogyny	104
The irony about understanding	108
The tragi-comedy of free will	112
From humour to eirōneia	114
The Uses of Myth in Middlemarch	117
Introduction	117
Myth, science and the pursuit of knowledge	119
Indefiniteness: towards an ethical use of myth	124
Antigone and agon	127
The politics of reading	131
Conclusion	135

“And what are we doing with our money?” (Middlemarch § 37)	139
The business of publishing Middlemarch : a profitable “experiment” and strategy	143
Money as a structuring motif, connecting link and disruptive force	146
The “subtle movement of old provincial society”	161
Money, credit, and “the implicit values by which people live their lives”	173
Of Wills and Codicils: “Who shall tell what may be the effect of writing”? (§ 41)	180
Young ladies (supposedly) “don’t understand political economy”	187
The earnings of George Eliot	190
De l’Amour de Dieu à l’amour de l’homme : aspiration religieuse
et sécularisation dans Middlemarch	195
Une éducation religieuse	199
Rejet de l’orthodoxie : rébellion, unitarisme et libre pensée	204
De la déconstruction à la reconstruction humaniste du christianisme	213
Liste des auteurs	227